Joe Hindy / Android Authority Remote access to a desktop is one of the most niche power-user features out there. However, it is perfectly doable on an Android device. There are two basic ways to do it. Users can remote into their Android device from a computer. We covered that functionality in our best screen mirroring apps for Android list. Price: Free / $79-$229 per year AnyDesk is a serviceable option in the remote desktop space on Android. It works like any other remote desktop app. You connect your phone to your computer and then use your computer from your phone. It worked pretty well in our testing and it uses a simple UI. There weren't any real issues with it. The app is free for personal use. The prices we listed are for commercial use mostly. It definitely has its flaws, but we also put apps in lists for a reason. Give it a try and see if you like it. Worst case, you don't and have four other options. VNC Viewer and this app competed for the fifth slot on this list so it's right up there as well. Chrome Remote Desktop is one of the most popular remote desktop apps. Users install the app from the Chrome Web Store on their computer and then this app from Google Play. From there, follow the installation instructions and you should be able to connect. The app worked most of the time in our testing. It's quicker and simpler than many of the other options, including TeamViewer. However, it's also been a couple of years since Chrome Remote Desktop saw an update as of the writing of this article. We recommend trying this one first, but don't be shocked if it's not a flawless performance. Microsoft Remote Desktop is arguably Chrome Remote Desktop's biggest free competitor. It works about the same way. You simply enable remote access on your Windows PC and install this app on your phone. The two should let your devices connect to one another. The positive part is not needing a Google Chrome installation for this one to work on Windows devices. The bad news is the performance is about the same so you're not really getting a better product. In any case, Windows PC users should definitely try this one first since it's first-party software and it may prove to be more stable over a longer period of time. Microsoft has another remote desktop app (Google Play), but it's more for Windows Server and Enterprise. Splashtop is a less popular, but still fairly successful remote desktop app. It works like the others with dual apps on your computer and Android device. You can access anything on your computer from your phone on your local network. You can add access from anywhere for $5 per month or $16.99 per year. This lets you access your device on any network, including any WiFi network or mobile data. The app also lets you access your webcam to check up on your home without too much trouble. It worked as well as Chrome and Microsoft did in our testing. TeamViewer is kind of the obvious choice for remote desktop apps. It gives remote access to your computer from your Android device. It's a little bit more complicated of a setup, but it works just as well as one would expect. It also includes features like file transfers in both directions, encryption, and real-time sound and HD video transmission. There are features included for helping, say, a friend or coworker. However, it works perfectly fine for just goofing around on your computer as well. The app is entirely free for personal use. Those who use it for business need a subscription. While you can cast Windows 10 to an Android TV, can you do it the other way round? A scenario where your whole Android TV screen is mirrored on your Windows 10 PC, and you can navigate around and control the UI. Well, we dug around and found a nifty way to control Android TV from a Windows 10 PC. You can open any app on Android TV, search for videos right from your PC, access the Play Store, and do much more. So without further ado, let's go ahead and find out how you can control Android TV from your PC. Control Android TV From Windows 10 PC (2021) Before we begin, make sure you have a WiFi router at home, to which both your Windows 10 PC and Android TV are connected. It allows you to wirelessly control the Android TV from anywhere on the home network. Now having cleared that, let's jump to the guide. 1. First of all, enable Developer Options on your Android TV. To do so, open Settings -> Device Preferences -> About and scroll down to the "Build" option. Now, click on the "Build" option 7-8 times continuously. It will enable Developer Options on your Android TV. 2. Next, go back to Device Preferences and scroll down. Find "Developer Options" and open it. Here, scroll down and enable the toggle next to USB debugging. 3. Once you have done that, open Settings again and go to Network and Internet -> [Your WiFi network] and click on it. Here, make a note of your IP Address. You will need it later. 4. Now move to your Windows 10 PC and download the scripny tool from the link here. It's an open-source tool that allows you to display and control any Android device over an ADB connection (both wired and wireless). Once downloaded, extract the zip file to a folder. The best part about scripny is that it comes with all the ADB files, so you don't need to set up ADB platform-tools separately. 5. Next, open the folder and type cmd in the address bar of the folder up-top, and hit enter. It will directly open a Command Prompt window in that folder. 6. Now run the ADB command to connect to the Android TV wirelessly. Enter adb connect ipaddress and hit enter. Make sure to replace ipaddress with the actual IP address that you noted above in step #3. As I said above, for this to work, both your Android TV and Windows 10 PC should be connected to a common WiFi network. 7. You will then get an "Allow USB debugging?" prompt on your Android TV. Enable the checkbox for "Always allow" and then click on the "OK" button. As a side note, if you get this dialog box out of the blue, especially when you have not triggered any command, then "Cancel" it immediately. This permission virtually allows anyone connected to the home network to control your TV. 8. If everything goes fine, then Command Prompt will output 'connected to ipaddress' response. Finally, run the adb devices command to confirm if your computer is indeed connected to your Android TV. Note: If the TV is not connected, then perform step #6 again, and this time, the TV will surely be connected. 9. Finally, enter scripny in Command Prompt and hit enter. Within seconds, your whole Android TV screen will pop up on your Windows 10 PC. That's amazing, right? 10. Now, you can perform all sorts of Android TV operations right from your Windows 10 PC. Click once to open anything, right-click once to go back (you can also press the Esc key on the keyboard), scroll vertically using the mouse, type in search boxes from the keyboard, and much more. You have all the Android TV controls right on your Windows 10 PC. Use Android TV From Your PC Through Wi-Fi That is how you can control and navigate around your Android TV from your Windows 10 PC without moving away from your desk. I love this feature and rely on it whenever I have to open an app or play some music in the background. Once you have set up everything, you need to run the adb connect and scripny commands to re-establish the connection. You can control your Android TV from your Windows PC anytime now. Anyway, that is all from us. If you want to learn more about such nifty features, go through our article on the best Android TV tips and tricks.
