The seven deadly sins can be tracked all the way back to the 4th century, when a monk named Evagrius Ponticus made a list of basically all the problems he saw in his time. His list consisted of gluttony, fornication, greed, pride, sadness, wrath, and dejection. Later on Pope Gregory I would edit this list and add in sloth and envy, and would also rename fornication to lust, this list of sins has not been changed since. Each of the seven deadly sins was associated with a punishment in Hell. Greek mythology has played a major role in the development of the seven deadly sins. Almost every Greek myth you hear can be represented by one of the deadly sins. Even the gods and goddesses personify the seven deadly sins. Three of the most interesting sins that can be compared to Greek mythology figures are wrath or strong vengeful anger, lust or intense sexual desire, and envy or jealousy.

A God that would match perfectly with with the deadly sin wrath would be the God of War himself Ares. Ares was the child of Hera and Zeus, Hera took a magical herb that allowed her to have Ares. Zeus really didn't care for Ares, once during infancy Ares had been abducted by two giants and they they trapped him in a bronze jar. Zeus paid little attention to this, and Ares was eventually released by Hermes. After this incident Hera decided to move Ares somewhere safer. She chose Priapus to train and raise Ares until he was a fully grown man.

Ares among the Greeks peoples was least favored because of his brutal nature. He was filled with rage and a lust for blood. He was known to switch sides during war, just so he could shed blood and cause war. He had a sibling rivalry with his sister Athen...

much that he tried to capture it in the water and died. Poseidon personified greed, continually seeking more riches for his underwater kingdom (Boone 1). He had palaces in the sea and on Mount Olympus that were made of gold.
