Although, Namibia is classified as an upper-middle income country with a per capita gross national income of about $ 8500, according to the International Monetary Fund, it still faces many development challenges related and similar to those faced by less developed countries. While the country has recently gone through considerable economic increase , with a growth rate increase of 3.6 percent in 1993 to 12 percent , before declining gradually to 5 percent in 2004 (with the exception of a contraction 1 , 1 percent in 2009) , currently the unemployment rate stood at 27.4 percent according to the Namibia Labour Force Survey.

Unemployment presents a stressed spatial and gender dimensions. It is higher in urban areas (28.3 percent) than in rural areas (26.2 percent), women (31.8 percent) than men (22.9 percent), and in youth 20 to 24 years and 25 to 29 years (48.55 percent and 33 percent, respectively). In part, this reflects the inequalities in access to productive resources such as land and capital. Nationally, the proportion of poor people has fallen, from 69 percent in 1993-1994 to 38 percent in 2004-2005, and more recently, to 29 percent in 2009-2010. The data referred to in part explains the marginal decrease in the Gini coefficient of 0.6455 in 1993-1994 to 0.6003 to 0.5971 in 2003-2004 and 2009-2010, and the low ranking of the country in the rate of (HDI), which was ranked 128 out of a total of 187 countries in 2012

Namibia's economy is small and open. It largely depends on extractive industries and limited processing of minerals for export as well as income from international trade agreements through the Southern African Custom Union. Nevertheless, the major contribution to GDP is very unstable. In 2012, Mining and quar...
