According to FBI Criminal Profiler Robert K. Ressler, those who abuse animals at a young age escalate to human violence later on in life (7). Because of this, we should increase the sentencing for convicted animal abusers and create a registry for convicted animal abusers. This will help to decrease the amount of violence on humans and when there is a violent act committed, it should allow the criminal justice system a place to begin leads or strengthen their case against the suspect. Many of the most notorious serial killers began committing violence against animals before progressing to human victims. Jeffery Dahmer for instance, began decapitating and dissecting animals at the young age of 10. He would bleach the bones of frogs and other animals, nail carcasses onto trees for show, and take decapitated animal heads and mount them on sticks. He was later convicted for 15 known murders (9). Martin Bryant who went on a 19-hour killing spree which resulted in 35 known victims was hospitalized during his younger years for torturing and harassing animals (8). Kip Kinkel, 15 years of age at the time, walked into his high school cafeteria and opened fire killing two and injuring 22 others used to boast about blowing up cows, frogs, pigs, cats and dogs by inserting fire crackers into their mouths. His parents were later on found shot inside their garage. 'The Boston Strangler' admitted after killing thirteen women that when he was younger, he would trap dogs and cats in crates and shot them with arrows until they bled to death. Luke Woodham, sixteen killed his dog. He wrote a very in depth account of the killing in his diary. He said that "he and a friend had tied his 'loved one' up in a plastic bag, had taken her into the woods and hit her while they listened to her howls. Woodham stated in his diary 'I'll never forget the sound of her breaking under my might...I will
