Some truths are universal. A child comes into this world with needs. Infants need to be physically close to their mother and be able to receive and give affection to form an everlasting emotional bond. Children need to feel that they are safe, that they will never be abandoned, and that they are loved and valued. This deeply special relationship between a mother and child steers the person's relationships for rest of his or her life. If this relationship is close and secure, then the child learns to trust and love. If this relationship is emotionally distant and inconsistent, and especially if there is abuse, then the child learns not to trust or care and believes that he or she is all alone and the world becomes a very large and scary place. The importance of this profound connection between mother and child cannot be over-stated enough. Since God created us for bonding, it's part of our very essence. ...n. What will emerge are children, born to parents that wanted them, that planned for them. Children whose needs are met, whose parents provide for them, whose parents cherish them. This all may sound too ideal for some, but every problem has at least one viable solution.

We can do this.

Because these children are

"Too big to fail".
