Japan is a country full of respect, family importance, and extremely valued education. The official language in Japan is Japanese. This language is almost spoken exclusively within Japan. The standard version of Japanese is called hy?jungo and has very few sounds, compared to other languages such as English. Many experts believe Japanese is an Altaic, an Austronesian, or a Southeast Asian language. There are other theories, but none can be completely proven true. Almost all linguists believe it is an Altaic language, relating to Korean, Mongolian, and Turkish. This makes some sense seeing the fact that the Yayoi people seem to have migrated from Korea to Japan.

Japanese scripts include hiragana, katakana, and kanji. Hiragana is similar to the Chinese cursive script. Katakana is derived from Chinese characters. Kanji is also imported from China. Both Japanese and Western style methods of writing are used in Japanese writing. Japanese elders adhere to the formally known cultural norms while the younger generations are more “westernized”. Some things Japanese generally do as a cultural norm would be to traditionally greet someone, you bow. You may come across as impolite to introduce yourself, so you must wait to be introduced. If you add the suffix “san” to someone’s name, you would be considered respectful and especially respectful for “sama”. You must remove your shoes before entering a Japanese home and put on slippers that are left at the door. Body language is very important and complex to the Japanese. The eldest in a group is honored in Japan. They are served first and their drinks are poured for them. You may not tip under any circumstance; you would have insulted the person. Also, to avoid spreading infection, sterilized masks may be worn in public.
