The slow moving economy of the United States' Great Recession would benefit intensely if we succeeded in passing an immigration reform in Congress. There is no uncertainty that illegal immigrants play an essential role in the nation's economy. President Obama has even stated that we "need to fix our broken immigration system" ("EFE News", par. 6). The Great Recession has been at its worst since the Great Depression and has decreased an approximate 8.7 million jobs. Bringing in new Americans can help revive various economically distressed businesses. Immigrants produce an additional revenue by creating and saving jobs and contributing extensively to the economy. Numerous industries would be able to take advantage of an expansion in their production as market demands increase. The United States would be able to fill in the jobs overseen and rejected by our U.S. citizens and as a result, help improve those numerous concerned industries. An explanation on why illegal immigrants struggle to come to the United States may have many uncountable reasons. They may begin their difficult crossing to America to escape poverty, an economic disaster, and limitations to their personal freedoms in their homeland. Immigrants may also arrive to accomplish the American dream, to seek freedom, and to obtain a better life in the nation that provides opportunity. They want to be in a nation where they can feel secure and liberated from any persecution. Many may also come as victims to violence or other threatening situations. The most important reason is that of a better land and job. The United States cannot turn its back to those who seek help and with time that will return the favor by boosting our economy. Those remarkable purposes to achieve in a land different than theirs do not come easy to them. Immigrants suffer from deportation or the fear of getting deported almost every day.
