In a democratic system, a bill goes through two distinct branches, the executive and the legislative branch. The bill becomes a policy only when it passes the legislative branch and executive branch. The legislative or executive branches do not have the ability to implement the policy or law; it is the responsibility of the bureaucracy to implement that policy. It is public employees who work in the bureaucracy. Almost thirty three percent of state and local employees belong to unions. The primary responsibility of the union is to protect its member's job and benefits. Over years unions have been able to increase their strength, while during the same time the state government has been trying hard to reduce union powers, especially during tough economic times. The focus of this essay is to describe the conflict between state government and public employee unions, by giving examples of current clashes between state and unions, how state is trying to curb union power. The main focus of the essay will be on the ongoing negotiations between unions and the state of New York.

The conflict between public employee union and the state government can be summarized in one sentence. The unions would like to increase upon, or at least maintain the same level of wages and benefits, and the state government tries to reduce them. Government argues that they need to balance their budget. In 2010, most of the large states were facing a budget deficit. When the state government facing economic downturns, they only have two choices to balance their budget. First is to raise taxes, which no politician would like to introduce. The second way is to reduce government spending, which politician tends to favour. States like Alabama, Ohio and Arizona,...

...tions. After the 2010 elections, in 29 states have Republican governor, and Republicans are controlling 26 legislatures. Republicans would try to hurt unions because they did not support them in elections. Although it is arguable, whether the reason unions were being targeted because of their political allegiance is with democrats. Even Democratic governors are targeting unions because they are facing budget deficit.

In conclusion, the fight between state government and public employee union is inevitable during tough economic times. When the state government was able balance their and economic times were good, union were not targeted. As soon state government feels economic constrains, the first target is public employees. The union try their best to make them heard, but when public is not on their side, it becomes difficult to succeed in the negotiations.
