As Winston Churchill once stated, “on no one quality, on no one process, on no one country, on no one route, and on no one field must we be dependent. Safety and certainty in oil lie in variety and variety alone.” America should not be relying on a select few countries for foreign oil. If one of these countries would stop supplying the United States with oil, it will impact America’s economy greatly. The United States used over “18.6 million barrels per day of petroleum products” back in 2012. They also buy “up to a quarter of [its] imported oil” from the Middle East. America has to buy up to “sixty percent of the oil it needs from foreign nations to keep the US economy running,” because the US does not produce enough oil to support itself. Is that not being dependant on one field as Winston Churchill would say?

Of course, America is not the only country who uses oil. Other countries like the “European Union, [who] uses half as much motor fuel as we do,” has the same size of economy as America. Obviously if other countries can reduce their fuel and oil usage, so can America. The question is, are people willing to turn their heating and air conditioning down and give up their cars when it is not necessarily needed?

According to Foreign Oil Dependence, “the United States is the world’s largest importer and user of oil.” Not only is that eighteen million barrels of oil used for motor vehicles, it is also used for air-conditioning, heating, road asphalt, lubrication for engines, and many other uses. Because there are so many uses for oil, being completely independent from oil is looking very uncertain in the future. The only way that America can stop importing so much oil is if they retain to other alternatives. These alterna...

...ly. Also, as stated before, this will take off the large target on America's back for using so much oil for environment standards. Being so dependent on oil, would American's be able to reduce their fuel and energy uses until the United States finds a better alternative?
