There is an unspoken menace, an accepted evil in our society. Its presence is duly noted, yet ignored. Their bright neon signs advertise their quick easy meals, but behind the facade of happiness lies a bed of deceit and lies. Their corporate grip can be felt in every part of your lives, on every street, and sidewalk. Fast food, it is a cute killer wrapped up in bright cellophane and cardboard, but one that cannot be ignored any longer. Today, more than 160,000 fast-food restaurants feed more than 50 million Americans each day, generating sales of more than $110 billion dollars annually. This disease of the body is not stagnant either, McDonald's alone opens new restaurants at the rate of 2,000 per year and employs more people than any other ...show more content...

(Pirello, P6) We should take clear and decisive action against the almost overwhelming grip of fast food, whether it be right in our home or out in courthouses and federal legislation unless it is too much of an economic burden. Fast food is like a cheap sweet poison, just like a cigarette is modified to get you hooked and addicted after just a few hits. The thought of buying fast food has now become perfunctory to us, we walk into a brightly lit one story restaurant that has neon lighting around the side, walk up to the counter and order God knows what with, mystery ingredients inside of it. Our order will be taken by a someone who is barely old enough to drive a car and probably hasn't even graduated from high school yet. However we will eat our greasy food, however bland it may be or how cold it is, we will allow these places to batter our taste buds with their salty, fat packed food. They will have us though, In fact in 2000 alone Americans spent more than...show more content...

Not literally, however, but each year less and less individually owned restaurants survive in this world. It's been the fear of many economists that these large conglomerates will absorb a section of the industry until they monopolize their specific part of the pie. Just like Standard Oil back in the 1800s the lack of competition could result in companies forcing consumers into eating low quality over priced food. The lack of competition in a free market will give too much power to the company over the consumer, this would put the company's interests for profit over their concern with the consumer's happiness. This fear is nothing to scoff at, already the meat industry is broken up into 5 large companies. Fast food is threatening to develop into the same box, the same few fast food chains (McDonald's, Burger King, Arby's, and Jack in the Box) will move into small town America and drive out old mom and pop eateries and diners, ones that our parents would hold dear as old childhood memories. This process keeps repeating over and over again, the already attractive chains offer cheap food in large quantity, that other places can't keep up with. Fast food is killing our food culture very quickly, and replacing it with the same neon signs and tasteless food, but no one can compete with the simple yet highly refined practices of the mega million
