There are several different historic country clubs in Dayton, Ohio including the Miami Valley Golf Club, the Dayton Country Club, and the Walnut Grove and Moraine Country Clubs. These country clubs and golf clubs provided entertainment and fun for Dayton families. In fact, in a newspaper article from 1971, the president of the Walnut Grove Country Club, William Blankenship, claimed to thrive on the fact that his club was indeed family oriented. They offered swimming instructions for young members to take while their parents golfed, good food, affordable family membership prices, and even occasional redecoration to keep things interesting.

The Walnut Grove Country Club was established in 1928 by Alva D. Wenrick, who had first wanted to turn the land into a health center. When that idea did not work out for him, he created the Greenmont Country Club which would later become Walnut Grove after 1935. A swimming pool and golf pro shop were added in 1954 and 1958 respectively, with possible plans for a tennis court addition in 1971 and a new bath house in 1987. The club sits on an underground river called the Hamilton and once it was tapped into, the club had two of their own wells to water the golf greens.

The Dayton Country Club was established in 1897 as the Dayton Golf Club. It is the reported as the oldest continuously operating club west of the Alleghenies. The clubhouse is said to be the “poshest” buildings among all the clubs in Dayton after 1929 when it was rebuilt. In that year, the Dayton Country Clubhouse was greatly damaged by a fire after the boiler in the building overheated. The golf course was the first one designed by Donald Ross in Dayton, Ohio. In 1948, the course was remodeled by William Diddel of Indianapolis...
