Is it to be expected that we, as mere humans, have the ability to prove or disprove the existence of God? In general most would say that it is not possible to prove the existence of a non-corporeal being, given that we do not hold all of the conceivable actualities. The question as to whether or not Humans need to prove that God exists has been an ongoing topic discussed for centuries and will undoubtedly never end. Surprisingly, it is philosophically possible to prove that God exist, however there are those who say that it is possible to prove that God is imaginary. Philosophically speaking there are several Arguments for the existence of God, we are going to take a look at just a few of there and their rebuttals.

The cosmological argument/The Argument From Cause-Effect which argues for an existence of a First Cause of the universe, and through an upsurge upon this, it is regularly employed within an argument for the presence of a limitless or superlative presence, generally acknowledged as God. Basically, we are saying that everything the human mind can conceive of, and the things in which we meet or come up against, has been brought about by something or someone and every single effect has its cause, even something as awe-inspiring and intricate as our universe has to have a source. There are two simple and connected thoughts that motivate this argument. The first being that “something cannot come from nothing” (Mosser, 2010, p. 149) and the second is that “every effect has a cause; there are no uncaused events, but anything that takes place was caused by a previous event” (Mosser, 2010, p. 149). You know that saying, which came first, the chicken or the egg? Well, to the cosmological proof, “God must exist because the chicken...
