Imagine your whole body paralyzed, frozen in time forever. Imagine your breath, artificially created by ventilators. Imagine being told that in ten days, your heart will be beating through a machine. Euthanasia and Physician Assisted Suicide (PAS) is a medical practice that can relieve an individual of their unwanted suffering and pain through either patient or physician induced suicide. The article, "Euthanasia: the perceptions of nurses in India" states that one of the main reasons that euthanasia is such a controversial topic is because it contests people's value systems (Poreddi et al). Value systems are the basis of the decisions that people make, and when these values are challenged, controversial topics such as euthanasia and PAS arise. When a patient's value system is tested based on the fact that he/she has a debilitating disease, then that system should not have to be tested again based on the denial of euthanasia or PAS. An individual should have the right to die if they deem it necessary for their own personal reasons (whether that reason may be to not be a burden to their loved ones, or escape the suffering that they're experiencing). If a patient meets certain requirements that deem the practice of euthanasia or PAS ethically and morally acceptable; then it should not be considered illegal. One requirement that should meet in order to deem the practice of euthanasia or PAS ethically acceptable is that the patient should give their consent for the practice to take place. If the patient's consent is given, then the violation of human rights is not affected. Suresh Bada

Math and Santosh K. Chaturvedi mention in their article that it is important to realize that every patient has the right to die with dignity (Math a..... middle of paper .....eld, Andrew M.
