Rain in a Dry Land is a documentary about two Somalian Bantu families who are given the opportunity to relocate to the United States in 2004 for a new start after living ten years in a Kenyan refugee camp. These families had to flee their homes to escape the constant warfare that had plagued their area; as a result they ended up in a refugee camp. The one family had their two daughters lost to them because of the attack on their people in their village. These two families enter America with some knowledge about the country, but no actual experience, therefore these people enter as Muslim, immigrants and of a completely different culture than Americans are used to. The two families have to learn to work in America, to school their children in the English schools, to get used to the technology and vast differences between what is acceptable in Somalia and what is not here. They have to reorient their whole lives to fit into a country that promises so much for these two families who have always had little to nothing before. The families also have to acclimate themselves to the American customs and traditions, meanwhile trying to not lose their own. These two families are each placed in a separate state and town where host families as a part of an organization will help them resettle for six months and then the families are on their own. According to a man by the name of Nathan Southern "during the first two years of life in its new homeland. One moves to Springfield, Massachusetts, the other to Atlanta, Georgia - two wildly disparate regions, though in each case, the families struggle against racism, discrimination, impoverishment, and massive doses of culture shock to build new lives for themselves, and retain overwhelming optimi..... middle of papercumentary states that, "As I followed them through their difficult changes, their story went from one about strangers in a strange land to a tale of incredible strength and resilience."Works CitedMakepeace, A.
