Education is said to be one of the most important factors of modern society because children are considered to be the future. Supposedly, with superior teachings, society will continue to evolve to greater standards. John Dewey, the father of experiential education, alludes to this acceleration of instruction in societies in his statement, where he considers the relationship between American high schools and a flourishing Democracy. American high schools are preparing their students for a Democratic life by not focusing only on the fundamentals and providing higher level classes to allow teaching to be directed away from the masses. As a result, not only is education and preparedness for the real world improving, but society as a whole is improving too.

Fundamentals provide the basis for all of society; without these functions, more advanced techniques and procedures could not be practiced in everything that is done today. This same rule applies to education because the fundamentals provide the ability to explore in more detail subjects of interest. Although the fundamentals provide the basis for education, they cannot be the only focus. Dewey states, “ The notion that the ‘essentials’ of elementary education are the three R’s mechanically treated, is based upon ignorance of the essential needed for realization of democratic ideals...” (164). Dewey implies the fundamentals of education “the three R’s” are needed, but there is also a need for education in different areas and in different methods to learn about the democratic ideals of society. Similarly, Ralph Waldo Emerson, one of America's most influential thinkers and writers, in his essay "Education" believes "Genius and Drill" are the basis for advancing in education. Acknowledge...
