The correlation between education and formal playing is a debate among researchers. Education is currently seen as a competition against students. Numerous parents consider that children who start their academic learning earlier, have greater advantages that could include higher levels of concentration and enhanced memory. They believe that fundamental skills such as reading should be instilled in children as young as five. However, no evidence supports this conception. Play is more appropriate for a young child's formal school experiences than academics. Children are active and experimental learners who acquire information and knowledge with all of their senses. Movement is the young child's preferred method of learning rather than seatwork. Children retain much more information when lessons are physical and require the use of all their senses. In addition, when children play they acquire numerous skills and partake in activities that they find attention-grabbing.

In pre-kindergarten classrooms today, preschoolers learn in the form of seatwork rather than playing. This way of lea...
