Whether people like it or not, uniforms are here to stay in modern society. They are seen everywhere, from schools to policemen. Uniforms are a requirement for life. In professional work settings and careers they are expected. On this basis, why wouldn't they be used in a school setting? School uniforms prepares children for their futures. Parents and elders are filled with pride when they see the future generations in clothing that highlights their intelligence. Any issues with them, such as expense, expression, and their actual classroom effects, are easily solved. More schools should require uniforms. As it is, the trend is growing with one in five schools wearing uniforms (“Are School...”).

To say school uniforms are expensive is an almost ridiculous claim. Clothing in general is expensive and professional dress (like oxford shirts and slacks) can be worn to many social functions. Rather than spending hundreds of dollars on designer clothing like Gucci, Rayband, or Hollister (“School Uniforms...”), parents can find two sets of uniforms for their children for around $70. When an average pair of jeans is already $50 on sale, this can make a big difference in the pockets of low-income families. This social barriers in regular public schools is also being addressed. Teachers in these schools are often taught to not compliment clothing choices of children, this can cause children to examine their clothing closer. If this happens, the self-esteem of some students may drop tremendously if they cannot afford clothing like their peers. Uniforms cut this out of the equation by allowing all students the same opportunity to advance. There are also other options for such families. Many schools offer installment loans for uniforms or 'recy...

...o create a fair opportunity environment for all of their students without being biased or judgmental to cultural or historic backgrounds. In uniformed schools this is reduced as students feel welcome in their environment. The debate over school uniforms seems to be one that will be divided for a long time. This should not be, as school uniforms show so many benefits and can outweigh the disadvantages.
