The word Democracy has been defined a number of different ways by many people all over the country. This word has also meant different things over the years as things began to change throughout the United States. People in the past had different views on Democracy because life back then was much different than it is today. People realize that they really have a voice and a chance to fight and vote for what they believe in. The television show, "The Voice", sees democracy as only the people who own an electronic device has the right to vote because there is not another way for people to get their vote in. On the other hand, Frederick Douglass sees democracy is only available to white men within the United States of America. Although democracy is usually defined as "a form of government in which people choose leaders by voting", it's sufficient to say that both "The Voice" and Frederick Douglass defined democracy a little bit differently, but still equally believe that the people are the ones who have the chance to make a difference and vote for what they think is right.

Frederick Douglass writes a letter to his old master and ends this letter with words that show that he is a citizen of the United States of America, "I am your fellow-man, but not your slave". He is telling his old master that he is no longer his piece of property, but that he is his equal instead. The last line in this letter basically sums up the whole letter and what he has been fighting for his whole life. This line shows that he is starting to make a change not only in his life but a change for the lives of other African Americans and that they all deserve a chance to have a voice. Douglass spent almost his entire life not being able to have the same r...
