One of the many conveniences of modern life is tap water running in most homes across the globe, but did you ever stop to think about what is in the water you're consuming? Before it reaches your house, water is combined with many chemicals in order to purify it and help make it better for consumption, but could some of these chemicals be causing more harm than good? One common chemical that is added to the public tap water supply is industrial grade fluoride, which is created as a byproduct of the manufacturing process of many fertilizers. When fluoride is added to water the process is called fluoridation. The reason behind the fluoridation of tap water is because it has been proven as a powerful solution to help decrease the amount of dental carries (cavities) especially in children. (Campbell 8) Fluoridation is considered as one of the "top ten public health achievements of the twentieth century" by the United States Center for Disease Control (CDC), and fluoride is found naturally in the ground water in some areas of the world; however, many studies show that there are numerous negative and potentially life threatening side effects of consuming industrial fluoride and the fact that consumption cannot be regulated means that for people who consume fluoridated tap water, this once great achievement may be more of a health hazard than anything. (Campbell 8-9) With high levels of naturally occurring fluoride in the ground water in some countries many studies have been conducted in these areas as well as in areas where it is added as industrial fluoride to find out just what the overconsumption could cause, and some of the results are devastating. These studies have shown that fluoride could cause a variety of illness from fluorosi...
