Race is defined as descendants of a common predecessor; one of the diverse variations of the human species. Also, it is defined through skin color and how you visualize other people. Race is not biological, but it is a physiological factor that determines people's ability to exist in United States. Racial classifications based on such recognizable characteristics as skin color, hair type, and body proportions. Races aren't equal, but that the question of race lies outside of the linear scale of "inferior" and "superior." This is clearly declining, as bad products often make the most money (Macintosh, American cars, junk food, fast food, cheap heroin), and with this kind of thinking ends the desire of a society to better itself, and it is replaced by a desire to be comfortable during the decline - convenience. Race matters because it is a source for racism and racial discrimination. Race doesn't matter as a genetic idea. The idea or concept of race is that race is important because of a perception of genetic homogeneity has been thoroughly exposing. Furthermore, race, as a scientific concept, never rested on solid scientific base. Biologically, there are no pure, distinct races. Which is not to say that there may not be biochemical differences among individuals. Some of those differences might be closely associated with groups that we categorize by race. For example, in the movie it states that some blacks have an extra muscle which helps them to run faster than other people. If race does not differentiate humans from one another genetically, then why does it matter?

Several studies document that "race" has been shaped by cultural, political, ideological and legal functions in society. That is, "race" is a social construct; middle of paperconstant state of change, interacting with each other and thusly balance the universe. It is because of the strong belief of this universal law, which decides the nature of female and male. This in turn results in the ancient gender stereotypes found throughout history. Men and women take their responsibilities correspondingly according to the separation of the natural characteristics of gender. The gender stereotypes are reflected in various fields, such as marriage, family, politics, and economy. In Asian countries, traditionally, the females role was to be in charge of home matters, such as serving her husband, looking after her children, and performing household chores like cooking and cleaning. This type of female was appreciated as "righteous". Gender is considered being the identity of each individuality and represent each character in a way to be existed.
