In the 1998 film Enemy of the State, (FOOTNOTE) a man named Robert Dean, played by Will Smith, has his life turned upside down when he unknowingly comes in possession of a wanted videotape. This videotape contains the actions of officials of the National Security Agency murdering the Congressman of New York whom opposes the Telecommunications and Privacy Act. The movie depicts NSA officials as having Robert Dean under visual and audio surveillance at all times. This is an example of invasion of privacy and, quite possibly, what the government is capable of doing. Enemy of the State portrays the government's lack of regard towards individuals' privacy, they do not care that they are exposing peoples personal lives when they do so. Our U.S. Government has become so discreet with their actions of citizen surveillance that we do not realize that we are being monitored every day. There are various arguments regarding whether government monitoring is constitutional or is simply invading an individual's right to privacy. Considering that America was founded on the constitution, which guarantees the freedom of religion, speech, press, assembly and petition through the first amendment and freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures through the fourth amendment, the current practice of governmental monitoring violates the rights of U.S citizens. The National Security Agency is responsible for global monitoring, collecting, decoding and translating information of data for foreign intelligence and counterintelligence purposes. This includes the surveillance of any suspicious or questionable individual on U.S soil. Many people question government monitoring and do not understand why the government has been monitoring phone calls, text messages and emails of American citizens as heavily as they recently have been. According to the NSA, the reason they monitor so
