Eleanor Roosevelt, the First Lady of the 32nd President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, is often considered to be the most influential of all the First Ladies, having extended the power usually given to a woman of her position to assist in the country's adoption of political policies that benefit the oppressed. Having often served as her paralyzed husband's eyes and ears, Eleanor incessantly traveled across the country to inspect the social conditions that the citizens of that region were living in. If these conditions were not up to her expectations, often her ideas for reform could be observed in the policies of the Roosevelt administration. Eleanor Roosevelt transformed the role of the First Lady of the United States of America through her influence on feminism, the rights of youth, civil rights, and the arts, each of these aspects having been incorporated into New Deal policies. Rising from a wealthy and despondent background in New York City, Anna Eleanor Roosevelt spent the first ten years of her life under the care of her mother and father. Her callous mother, highly critical of her daughter's appearance and persona, generated a sense of self-consciousness in the young woman. Additionally, her father struggled with alcoholism (Eleanor Roosevelt). After the death of her parents, Eleanor and her brother were left under the responsibility of her strict grandmother, Mary Hall. However, Eleanor was finally given the opportunity to blossom into a confident, passionate young woman when she began attending Allenswood Academy in London, England at the age of fifteen ("Roosevelt, Eleanor"). Had Eleanor not been given the chance to attend this boarding school, the likelihood of her ability to boldly promote change in the world would have...
