Css stylesheet inheritance.

It can apply to more than one element, but only those where you have added that particular class.IDS: If your selector is an id, like #Uniqueparagraph, it is very specific. As with many CSS elements, remembering which elements inherit and which do not is mostly a matter of experience. One of the simplest ways your browser does this is by paying attention to the order in which your rulesets appear. Keep in mind that the order in which you add things to your style sheet only matters when it comes to resolving these kinds of conflicts. Think of it like water cascading over rocks in a stream: your browser will flow and consider each of the sets of style sheet rules, but will definitely not settle on any until it reaches the end. Since the element contains all the other HTML elements visible on the page, they would all inherit the font you gave it. There are a number of other more advanced ways to increase the specificity of your selectors, mostly involving several selectors separated by spaces or symbols. In other words, understanding the inheritance will help you avoid conflict in the first place. As before, you cannot do both at the same time. However, your browser uses the concept of specificity to determine which rules to follow, and cares even more about specificity than about order. This means that the browser will choose any rule from rules have more specific selector, regardless of how the Rules are ordered. In the example above, the text would be green, because the #special selector is more specific than the P selector. Specificity Another common conflict with CSS Rules is when you have multiple rulesets with different selectors targeting the same elements. The important thing is to understand the broad concepts so you have an idea of what to look for when you are not sure how something. So you don't take a break, but when you don't come back, you don't forget the Made, you add an additional set of rules that changes the links to have green text. One of them targets the paragraphs in general, while the other targets the added ID: #Special {color: green; } p {color: purple; } As the P selector directs all the elements of the page and the element to which you added the "special" ID is a element, you asked the browser to make two conflicting things. You now told your browser to make two conflicting things, so what should he do? And just as in human relationships, parents usually pass characteristics to their children. But we will not focus on them in these lessons. Herança Although cascading connectivity and specificity are explicitly on conflict resolution, heritage is more about keeping CSS ordered and avoiding unnecessary repetitions. Imagine that you have a element with a element inside it: here is a paragraph whenever an HTML element contains another element, They are commonly described as Father and Son. CSS selectors follow a consistent hierarchy when it comes to specificity, so you can always tell which selector is the most specific. For example: elements; If your selector is an HTML element, such as P, it is not very specific. As you add more and more CSS to a sheet of styles, inevitably there will be conflicts like that. For example, consider the example above. Cascade Cascade refers to the logic that your browser uses to determine which CSS rule sets are the most important, especially when they conflict with each other. It applies widely to all elements of the page.Classes: If your selector is a class, such as #specialparagraph, it will be more specific. This is because element inherits your father's font-family statement, the element. The same principle applies to many levels above. / en / basic-css / organization-and-sizing-in-css / content / fortunately, three fundamental concepts can help you understand how to tRufUlavTgiaSULP.ytilibisivSorlocDnorgkcb emos tiEvig'sL.wollof ot steselurAhFo hcihw esoohcElbaSi resworb ruoy.gnidacascBATA y.ecno ta htoB odT'nac tiDna,sgniht tnereffid owt resworb eht gnillet tubAaLaA legaT no stnemele >a
