Android apps and games can be installed from the Android Market or outside of the Google Play Store at a surprisingly low cost. You can do this on any Android device because it's called sideloading. Google Play Protect has some ability to detect malware and other app sideloading issues, but it's not as secure as downloading from the official store. It is very likely that you will come across Bundle apps when using APK mirror. These are application packages that are installed independently of the APK file. When you download an APK package, you should do the same for a regular APK file. The result is exactly the same as installing an APK file: a completely different process is required. How to Sideload an Android Application When it comes to Android applications, sideloading is generally defined as the process of loading an APK format application package onto an Android device. The app, which is not currently available on the Google Play Store, can be downloaded on any Android device and installed separately. Although side loading is not inherently dangerous, it is important to be aware of all the risks associated with it. To load the application on your Android device, open Settings and then the Applications menu. To install unknown applications, turn on special application access under Advanced. They can then find the APK file they want to install and tap on it to start the installation process. Still annoyed that Xiaomi boxes don't have enough software? Are you always confused about how Xiaomi boxes download third-party software? Today, Xiaobian offers a tutorial on how to install third-party software on a Xiaomi device. Let's look at it together.
