

I'm not robot

Violet beauregarde willy wonka 1971

Violet Beauregarde is portrayed as a highly competitive and ambitious character who is obsessed with chewing gum, holding a record for being the Junior World Champion Gum Chewer. She is described as talkative, brash, and cynical, with a hot-headed and impatient personality. In the 1971 film adaptation, she was played by Denise Nickerson, while in the 2005 remake, she was portrayed by AnnaSophia Robb. Violet's behavior is marked by her boastful and arrogant attitude, as well as her love for competition, sports, and martial arts. In the original book, Violet is depicted as a more refined lady despite her bad manners, whereas in most adaptations, she is portrayed as simply "Mother" to her mother out of arrogance. Her appearance varies between films, but she often wears blue-colored clothing that reflects her love for the color. Violet Beauregarde is a young girl who wears a distinctive outfit in the story. She has a blue watch on her right wrist and white shoes with blue designs. When she receives the Golden Ticket, she wears a cerise tracksuit jacket with silver writing and a matching shirt with brilliant amaranth stitching. In concept art, this design includes long, ginger hair tied up in pigtails. Violet Beauregarde, a ruthless and athletic junior champion, enters the competition with an air of hostility towards her rival, Violet is a gum-chewing contest world-record holder. She's also a bad sport, having no friends due to her competitive streak and poor winning etiquette. Her mother, Scarlett Beauregarde, initially encourages Violet's unruly behavior but later disapproves when they leave the factory. In contrast to other adaptations, Violet in the 2013 London musical is portrayed as an African American fame-hungry wannabe from California. In theatrical versions, Violet is often accompanied by her mother, who both scolds and secretly enables her gum-chewing habit. The character's depiction varies across different media, including video games where she must be rescued from a giant blueberry form. Violet's actions in the novel lead to her transformation into a blueberry after eating an experimental three-course dinner gum that contains blueberry pie. Despite Willy Wonka's warnings, Violet ignores him and pays the price by inflating into a massive blueberry. To get Violet to the juicing room quickly and prevent her from exploding, they roll her there immediately. In the 1971 film version, when Violet starts inflating, her belt partially blocks the swelling but eventually pops off, causing her midsection to fill with juice and balloon. As she continues to inflate, her arms and legs swell into the rounded-out blueberry, while only her hands, feet, and head remain intact. The Oompa Loompas lower her to the ground due to her size, and after being rolled away, Violet is not seen again. Mr. Wonka reassures Charlie that the other children will be restored to normal but adds that they may gain some wisdom from their experience. Violet's Transformation in Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory The eccentric Mr. Beauregarde frantically summons his lawyer to arrange Violet's demise without much thought or care. Meanwhile, Violet appears visibly distressed as the Oompa Loompas mercilessly ridicule her enormous size, joking that she needs a tent to cover her massive, round body. The song reaches its climax when Violet finally succumbs to their taunts, ending with a dramatic splash of purple goo and confetti as her body bursts into pieces. In a shocking display of concern, Mr. Beauregarde panics over his daughter's supposed explosion, but Wonka nonchalantly assures him that she merely popped her bubble. He then instructs the Oompa Loompas to transport Mr. Beauregarde to the Juicing Vat to salvage Violet's fragments and repair her before she spoils. Conversely, Veruca seems delighted by Violet's gruesome fate. In some theatrical adaptations, Violet sings a song called "Chew it" prior to transforming into a blueberry, which is essentially a monologue about her obsession with chewing after which she consumes the three-course dinner gum from Wonka and chews some more. The scene then transitions into her swelling into a blueberry amidst the other kids' astonishment, only to be carried away by the Oompa Loompas. However, certain versions depict Violet's sticky demise, culminating in her being dragged off stage with a popping sound effect as confetti simulates her bursting body parts. In some renditions, the Oompa Loompas enter the scene covered in blue paint, while others have Violet reappearing on stage to sing an embarrassing song or being absent altogether, having exploded into goo mere moments ago. In contrast, behind-the-scenes footage reveals that the 1971 adaptation simulated the blueberry scene by inflating actress Elizabeth Smith in a rubber suit and forming her outline using two halves of a styrofoam ball. This process took approximately 45 minutes to complete, during which time Smith was unable to take lunch breaks; instead, she was rolled around on set every five minutes to maintain blood circulation. Meanwhile, Julie Dawn Cole, who played Veruca, reportedly saw Smith as the "cool American girl" but also viewed her as a large purple ball, causing her considerable embarrassment. The 2005 version, directed by Tim Burton, combined real footage of Violet's actress with digital effects to enlarge her blueberry rather than just its width. Although the original plans called for a similar approach to the 1971 adaptation and the scene of Violet and her mother leaving the factory, the filmmakers ultimately opted for a more creative solution. In the London Musical version, Violet inflates after pressing a button on her blue backpack, causing her to run around and get trapped inside a massive metal disco ball. The sequel, Charlie and the Great Glass Elevator, does not feature Violet alongside Augustus, Veruca, and Mike but merely mentions her absence. Willy Wonka recalls giving gum to Violet Beauregarde, but he corrects himself by saying that it was actually stolen from him, as all his gifts come with a guarantee. The gum in question was still needed for testing and not meant to be given away freely. In the 2005 film adaptation, Violet is seen using already chewed gum pieces on elevator buttons to annoy people, inadvertently revealing her true nature. A song about Violet's obsession with chewing gum appears in both novel and film versions, with slight variations. The original story featured a "Miss Bigelow" who chewed gum excessively until she suffered a severe injury. In the 2005 version, the song is performed by the Oompa Loompas while they roll Violet around in blueberry form. Violet's love for chewing gum is an all-consuming monomania that drives her to attempt breaking world records. Her personality is portrayed as sassy and headstrong in the 1971 film, with a tendency to be annoyed by those around her. In contrast, the 2005 adaptation depicts Violet as arrogant and over-competitive, reflecting her mother's excessive praise and vanity. Violet views herself as superior to others, including Veruca Salt and Charlie Bucket, labeling them as "losers" and "non-entities." However, her callous behavior is quickly disapproved of by her mother upon exiting the factory. Violet's transformation into a blueberry has physical consequences, causing her body to be filled with blueberry juice and her skin to turn blue. In the 2005 version, she also becomes unnaturally flexible. Violet Beauregarde is a prominent character from the 1964 children's book Charlie and the Chocolate Factory. In the film adaptation, 'Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory' (1971), she was portrayed by actress Denise Nickerson. The character gained new prominence in the 2005 remake film, which reverted to the original title, 'Charlie and the Chocolate Factory'. Here, Violet was played by Annasophia Robb. The peculiar properties of this gum included a full three-course meal and dessert. However, it turned out to be defective - Violet started turning blue and expanding in size while chewing the blueberry pie part. This bizarre occurrence prompted Wonka's Oompa Loompas to take her to the juicing room, ultimately leading to her expulsion from the factory.

Willy wonka and the chocolate factory 1971 violet beauregarde. Violet beauregarde willy wonka. Violet beauregarde dutch. Violet beauregarde 1971. Who played violet in willy wonka 1971. Characters in willy wonka 1971.